Blecker, G.A. (2006). Modern trends in English teaching for particular purposes. Yearly Review of Applied Modern Linguistics, 26(5), 167-188. doi: 12.1019/S02691907453453C.

This article focuses on reviewing different trends in English Teaching for Particular Purposes (ETPP) in terms of practice and theory. Blecker identifies the trends to three sects that are described as non-exclusive, including sociocultural, sociodiscoursal, and sociopolitical. She explains that sociodiscoursal is quite challenging to distinguish from actual genre analysis due to the presence of several major players tending to writing and researching in favor of both the disciplines.

Blecker also acknowledges the so-called preconceived failures of ETPP in general, involving its focus on venues that are narrowly defined (p.167), with the tendency to lean towards helping "learners to fit into, instead of contesting currently existing structures" (p.166), as well as the supposed effective approach. As response to the common apprehensions regarding ETPP, Blecker cites the AA School and the New Movement Organization since these two institutions have ultimately influenced further progressive changes, giving more depth to the actual "genre" (p.167).

She also concludes that these two concepts answers the issues revolving ETPP focusing on communities that are described as 'monologic'. Another discipline that is currently expanding in terms of knowledge is Corpus linguistics in order to enhance instruction among content particular aspects. In the end, she ultimately agrees with Shale (1998) that majority of the genres which could help learners of ESL are either poorly taught or hidden.

At the same time, that the field of genre is just starting to grasp the overall multitude of complexities in this possibly valuable method towards the instruction of language, and in writing, overall. This article also offers examples and expert opinions that can be used in my project. This will give me proof in supporting my claims regarding the current disciplines involved in ESL learning.
