ABSTRACT

Terrorism has assumed a global phenomenon threatening nations and their peaceful co-existence. The Boko Haram terrorism in Nigeria has continued to undermine Nigeria's sovereignty. Strategies have been employed in the fight against the group, from a military crackdown, the declaration of state of emergency and efforts aimed at a dialogue with the group with little utilization of the roles traditional institutions can play. The paper aims to show how changes in the role of traditional institutions contributed to the current security challenges facing Nigeria. The paper asserts that the involvement of the traditional institutions will help towards the security management in the country. Their efforts in conflict resolution and intelligence gathering are well acknowledge across the Nigerian state. The paper employs a historical comparative analysis to show how despite the erosion of the powers of the traditional institutions from the colonial era up till the present day, they have fared well in the resolution of conflicts within their domains. The paper recommends that the traditional institutions should be fully integrated in the security management of their communities with definite functions entrenched in the constitution of Nigeria.
